

Modern offices should be flexible so that they can be adapted to changing conditions. Yet at the same time, an open office landscape needs organisational structures that reflect the company's identity and define pathways for movement and communication. This is where Kado Office comes into play.

Kado Office is a minimalist interior planning system consisting of freestanding structures. The clean lines of the frame give it an architectural look and playful three-dimensionality. Kado Office is accessible from both sides, so that in addition to providing storage space, it can also be modified with further elements and predefined modules to serve many other functions that facilitate office work.

Kado Office can be assembled into diverse configurations. Thanks to its ingenious construction with square tubes and corner connectors, the system has a light and airy appearance. The overall structure follows the grid format commonly used in office planning, with heights corresponding to three, five or seven ring binders. The frame can be equipped with elements such as lockers, pull-out drawer units, cabinets with side-hinged doors, open boxes, coat racks, whiteboards and fabric-covered panels as well as add-on tables or ThinkTank modules.

Kado Office elements are assembled, reconfigured and disassembled by simply twisting the square tubes through 45°.

CONNECTORS

The end and middle frames of Kado Office consist of square tubes (25 x 25 mm) and diverse corner connectors, depending on the configuration. A firm stable connection is achieved by twisting the square tubes through 45°. All structures can also be easily dismantled or reconfigured.

Different basic widths are available depending on use: 40 cm for shelving, 80 cm for storage modules or the small meeting table, 120 cm for the ThinkTank and 160 cm for the large meeting table.

Shelf units measuring 40 cm in depth can be fitted with modules accessible from alternate sides; modules for 80-cm deep units can be used on both sides.
